- 23 The upper part of a nude Male Figure, $\bar{3}\frac{1}{2}$ in. long, in some kind of greenish frit coated with a chocolate brown glaze; the figure is standing, the arms hang down and the back of the surviving hand is turned to the front; the head is broken away, but the shape of the break shows that it was small and sprang from a long thin neck; this would point to Thoth or Nēhebkau, of great rarity; Saite period or later. [Pl. I]

 The representation of a deity entirely unclothed is, it is believed, without parallel except in the case of child-gods such as Harpakhruiti. It is possible that there was a golden kilt, but this is unlikely, as there are no signs of its attachment, and owing to the plinth at the back it could not have been soldered round the body. It would seem that the figure has been treated in the nude deliberately, possibly under the influence of Greek art. This view is strengthened by the likeness of the pose and modelling to those of the headless female statue in the Museum of Alexandria.

[Pl. I]

 The representation of a deity entirely unclothed is, it is believed, without parallel except in the case of child-gods such as Harpakhruiti. It is possible that there was a golden kilt, but this is unlikely, as there are no signs of its attachment, and owing to the plinth at the back it could not have been soldered round the body. It would seem that the figure has been treated in the nude deliberately, possibly under the influence of Greek art. This view is strengthened by the likeness of the pose and modelling to those of the headless female statue in the Museum of Alexandria.

I]

 The representation of a deity entirely unclothed is, it is believed, without parallel except in the case of child-gods such as Harpachruti. It is possible that there was a golden kilt, but this is unlikely, as there are no signs of its attachment, and owing to the plinth at the back it could not have been soldered round the body. It would seem that the figure has been treated in the nude deliberately, possibly under the influence of Greek art. This view is strengthened by the likeness of the pose and modelling to those of the headless female statue in the Museum of Alexandria.

- 23 The upper part of a nude Male Figure, $3\frac{1}{2}$ in. long, in some kind of greenish frit coated with a chocolate brown glaze; the figure is standing, the arms hang down and the back of the surviving hand is turned to the front; the head is broken away, but the shape of the break shows that it was small and sprang from a long thin neck; this would point to Thoth or Nehebkau, of great rarity; Saite period or later. [Pl. I]

 The representation of a deity entirely unclothed is, it is believed, without parallel except in the case of child-gods such as Harpakhruiti. It is possible that there was a golden kilt, but this is unlikely, as there are no signs of its attachment, and owing to the plinth at the back it could not have been soldered round the body. It would seem that the figure has been treated in the nude deliberately, possibly under the influence of Greek art. This view is strengthened by the likeness of the pose and modelling to those of the headless female statue in the Museum of Alexandria.
